Re: Senior Project Manager, Learning and Project Solutions, Job 8620968002

Dear ACLU Hiring Team,

In coalition work, the most consequential question is often not whether people care or even whether they agree. It is whether a decision can survive the room: whether someone who was not present can understand what was decided, what remains open, who holds the next action, and where protected information must stop. During a 2026 Commercial Rent Stabilization collaboration, I built and stewarded more than thirty pages of shared campaign memory connecting minutes, decisions, action items, legal and policy questions, media assets, public-data framing, and city and state strategy—while keeping private coalition records offline.

I am drawn to the Senior Project Manager role in Learning and Project Solutions because it treats implementation as organizational learning. Through Thick Arts LLC and long-running civic and cultural projects, I have led work from stakeholder discovery and current-state analysis through requirements, future-state workflows, implementation plans, testing, rollout, training, closeout, and retrospectives. I translate among technical, operational, policy, communications, and community perspectives; name risk and unknowns; and build project structures people can actually use.

My work with KC Town Hall adds a different scale of implementation. I co-led planning, vendor coordination, municipal compliance, and public-benefit documentation for the adaptive reuse of an approximately 6,500-square-foot historic building. I co-developed a successful $490,539 public funding request and served as the City's named developer and presenter, while decisions and outcomes remained collective and formally governed. That experience taught me that a plan is not complete when it is persuasive. It must also assign authority honestly, connect field dependencies, protect the record, and make correction possible.

The ACLU's mission makes those distinctions especially material. I would bring warm, source-grounded communication; confidentiality and accessibility awareness; and a commitment to project standards that support judgment rather than replace it. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss an implementation in which the values of the institution changed the plan—and how I would help Business Operations and Support Services make that learning durable.

Warmly,
